History

Shayleigh Chandler was adopted as an infant by a family in Upstate New York. Her home in Niagra Falls was a warm place and she was a very loved child. Her parents at the time of adoption agreed not to tell her she was adopted for reasons they never shared.

Her father was a fire fighter for the State of New York and her mother ran a small bed and breakfast from their home. Their home was not rich, but well appointed and the continual stream of tourists traveling to Niagara Falls made it interesting on a daily basis. The Chandler's family was active and athletic and enjoyed taking their daughter even at a very age, camping and hiking. They were often accompanied by her cousin. Angus who was 7 years older.

As she grew Shayleigh became very aware of the fact the some things made her feel odd; a trip passed a graveyard, a chance meeting with someone random or an unexplained warm sensation when she was camping became normal although never really sat well with her.

When she was 7 years old, Shayleigh dug out an old dart set from her parents' garage. During the long winter, she would go out to the garage and throw darts every night after dinner for hours. It was hard to explain to anyone why she was so enthralled with the game, but it bordered on obsession. Her parents didn't seem to mind but some of her tantrums when she didn't score perfectly were tiresome and best and sometimes disturbing. .Angus moved in with the family. No one ever talked about why he was there and Shayleigh only asked about him once. The awkward silence kept her from asking again.

3 years later, Shayleigh's love of throwing darts had transferred to throwing other things too. She threw softballs, lawn darts and even tried archery but it was when her father introduced her to throwing knives that she found her passion. It started as a joke for the most part; a firefighters picnic and a set of steak knives coupled with a friendly bet began a more serious competitive skill.

For two solid years everyday after school, Shayleigh's dad worked with her and then hired a professional to help. She worked hard, hating to "loose" even when it was just against herself. She developed a keen eye and precise athletic skill for judging distance and understanding how the balance of a knife worked. Her mother was not very happy about the knives, but she encouraged Shayleigh anyway

When she turned 12 Shayleigh and her father entered a competition in Texas. The experience was both thrilling and frustrating. She scored well but didn't win and that led to another year of obsession in training. Her grades were never fantastic, but during the coming year, they really suffered. Shayleigh was not just curious, she was jealous of the relationship Angus had with the extended family. When she asked about it, again she was treated with awkward silence and half answers about them being too "rural" and barely civilized.

She attended the competitions yearly and settled into a more teenage routine of school, boys and music but she attended competitions yearly. Each year she advanced. When she was 13 Angus left with no explanation.

At 15 Angus came back. It was a terrible meeting. Her parents obviously didn't want him there but they didn't throw him out. They fought nightly but Shayleigh could never hear what they said. Every time she was close enough to hear, they would stop. The stress level in the household was miserable for the next year.

But Angus took a lot of interest in Shayleigh. And Shayleigh began to feel so strangely around him. He asked her about her knives and she showed him how to throw. They spent the days talking. He asked her questions about her youth, and asked her about things she couldn't believe he knew, like the strange activities that seemed to surround her. He guessed about her rage and innately developed a smooth conversation with her that made her feel so at ease.

Shayleigh's parents noticed the closer relationship between the two and her mother took her aside and told her to stay away from Angus. Shayleigh was confused. He was just her cousin and the stress her mother placed on her not to speak to him alone anymore made Shayleigh unsure of either of their motives.

On a summer night, Angus came into Shayleigh's room and told her to follow him. He took her to the falls and then told her who her parents really were and that she had been adopted. He wouldn't say how he knew the information, but he told her they were not related, but that his parents and hers had known each other. He told her to ask her parents about it. And then he kissed her. Not a friendly kiss, this kiss was more like the passionate kisses she had only seen on TV or in the movies. She was dizzy and so lightheaded, that she was sure she could float home.

When she arrived back home she confronted her parents. They were furious that she had been out with him, and after a horrible fight (and no answers) her father hit Angus. Angus was so angry that even she was afraid of him. Her father ran for a shot gun and Angus seemed to rage farther and farther until something horrible happened. He changed from human to something monstrous. Shayleigh was rocked in a powerful confusion that shattered what she knew as reality. It was impossible and yet...it wasn't.

Angus left after a confusing sequence of events that left her father injured and her mother sobbing hysterically. When the police came, Shayleigh couldn't believe she heard them lie to the police. They reported that they had left the back door open when they went to put out the trash and a wild animal had gotten in.

Shayleigh again asked her parents about being adopted and eventually they told her the truth. Shayleigh was crushed. She felt lied to and betrayed and she had the strong feeling that what had happened to Angus was at the heart of it all.

Angus began to email her a few months after that. They never directly mentioned anything about what she had seen but she loved writing letters to him and eagerly waited for letters back. It always confused her to no end why he couldn't come and see her and eventually she felt heartbroken over it. Yet, she still fantasized about seeing him again living with him...sharing a lot more than a kiss with him.

At 17 she saw Angus again. He looked terrible and somehow wild but the second she saw him, she felt the familiar sensation he always made her feel. She begged him to take her away from her home but he said no. He had to prepare for something and he had to take care of business. He explained to her that he was moving to New York City and that he would most likely not see her again. Shayleigh was again crushed. Any resolve she had crumbled and she ran away from him weeping. Her dreams broke into fragments.

But after a few months, Shayleigh started thinking about him again and she wasn't willing to give up. Shayleigh didn't tell her parents about it but she secretly made plans to move as soon as she turned 18. She applied for several jobs and finally found a simple one in the city working at a bookstore and with a little savings and graduation money, she moved.

Her parents were not happy with her and have tried several times to convince her to come home. But Shayleigh is convinced she can find Angus again.
